

I've surfed every possible website and media producing content about Esports and the gaming community. I'm currently a junior data analyst for a small league team. Most of the time, I got my references or resources through players' social media, blogs, or subreddits. These are the playgrounds not only for gamers but also for bloggers and media stations' favorites. I often read blogs like Kotaku, Espn, and DotEsports.

There are grassroots media providing a variety of content for their fellow gamers in their country as well as well-known media stations like Fox, ESPN, The Scores Esports, and IGN. Most of the content is published on the web. Their contents are mostly blog posts and referral links that direct them to their website. Mostly match breakdown, tournament news, and other tips and tricks for newbies or even hard stuck players can make a profit out of it. Some well-known teams have their own content team which is working through a massive media platform like YouTube. There, they can upload certain players' stats, twitch clips, or create their own content with their sponsors. For example, TSM is working on YouTube for a long period of time and got pretty strong viewers lately. Their strategy is to make players and their fans connected even though their gaming platforms are different. That kind of content is making a huge interest for fans who hates reading.

For social media content and information, there are plenty of analysts and panelists posting about the tournament stats, players' stats, and others. We can reach athletes' social media for their daily tweets, opinions, and experiences. In the future, this type of content might grow bigger. Depending on the audiences' needs, we have to provide certain content as well as construct a strong community
