Project Description

Based on what you've learned about Esport organizations, create your own dream Esport organization. Make sure to address the topics and questions listed below in your Esport organization proposal.

Esport

Which Esport(s) does your organization support. Share why you chose to just support one Esport vs. supporting multiple.

Purpose

What is the purpose of your brand? Who are your target audience? Wanting to win isn't enough. Every Esport organization wants to win, but winning is only part of the bigger picture. Are you striving solely to be the best competitive team the Esport has ever seen? Are you attempting to make a media empire, with your Esport teams reaching the widest viewership? Are you trying to integrate traditional sports with Esports in a way that benefits both? Ideally, you'll have multiple primary goals, but you shouldn't try to tackle them all when you are first starting a brand. Solidify your brand's primary goals so your audience knows exactly what to expect from you.

Personality

How would you describe your organization's personality? There isn't just one way to present yourself. Are you a fun-loving brand or a more serious brand that's all about work efficiency and producing results? Select a personality type that best matches your organization's existing Esport titles, its professional players, and the intended goals of upper-management.

Logos and Colors

Every good brand needs a logo that people will recognize and say, "That's my favorite Esports team!" Color scheme is immensely important, too, because your colors will be posted all over apparel, signage at events, news websites, and social media. The new Overwatch League (OWL) with its twelve new brands is a great example of well thought-out logos and color scheme selection. Each team has utilized colors and imagery that evoke their city or country of origin. Identify your organization's logo and color(s).

Branding and Marketing

Where do you want your brand to end up in the Esports "space"? Brand positioning is about determining the specific niche you want your brand to occupy in the larger, overarching market of Esports. Who do you want your target audience to be? Most brands target the 18-25 age demographic because they play video games the most. However, you might want to target those who watch the game. What about international viewers? Can your brand be positioned to cater to them, too? Only after you've determined your target audience should you begin to identify marketing strategies to try and reach it. Marketing strategies abound, but whichever ones you choose, you'll probably need to adapt them to Esports.

Competitive Awareness

It's also important to devise ways to promote your brand even when your teams are struggling competitively. No one likes to lose, so how can you maintain your viewers' interest without a victory? One of the best ways to do this is to create engaging content based on your players' personalities. Even if your team is currently winning, you should implement ongoing strategies to keep your audience interested. If or when your team goes into a slump, you'll be thankful you did and appreciated for your foresight
