

≡ Item Navigation

Effective Esports Social Media Tactics

Since Esports are now played via console and PC, social media has become an important way for professional players, Esport organizations, and game developers to interact with fans. Below are some examples of effective social media from Twitter.

Art Commissioned as Propaganda

The LA Gladiators organization found a fun way to give back to their fan community by commissioning art in the style of US propaganda posters. Notice the ‘Rosie the Riveter’ post. It has 2.2k likes, which is extremely solid considering the fan base of the newly formed LA Gladiators.

- <https://twitter.com/LAGladiators/status/956293241627803648>
- https://twitter.com/Sky_Saw/status/956302199864270848
- <https://twitter.com/LAGladiators/status/953753049163448320>

Fun Pictures

During the 2017 League of Legends off-season, teams were typically announcing their rosters with small videos. The team Optic took a unique approach and produced an entertaining, holiday card-style image. To add further meaning and value to the image, each Optic player dressed up in a costume representing a special characteristic of him. For example, the player on the left, dressed as the Green Arrow, has the gamertag of “Arrow.” The player in the back, dressed as a Sith, has the gamertag “PowerOfEvil.” This creative image generated over 5k likes for an organization that was new to League of Legends.

- <https://twitter.com/OpTicLoL/status/942801771944058880>

Big Gameplay Clips

Posting entertaining gameplay clips is another great way to reach out to fans. In the example below, @Lolesports, the Twitter account for League of Legends’ competitive side, posted a clip of a professional player outplaying two of his opponents when he should have lost. Clips like this get fans excited and generate hype for the game, which is another reason why game developers love having streamers play their titles.

- <https://twitter.com/lolesports/status/955492761238556672>

Player Trash Talk

Arguably the most fun, social media trash talk can be a make-or-break way for professional players to create a name for themselves. An example of this is player Doublelift’s experience after being kicked off Team Solo Mid. In the season opener of 2018, Doublelift’s new team played against Team Solo Mid and destroyed them in a very lopsided fashion. Within minutes of beating his former team, Doublelift posted a tweet saying, “best in the west OMEGALUL,” making fun of his former team’s loss and highlighting the irony of an earlier prediction that Team Solo Mid was “the future best western team in League of Legends.” The tweet immediately garnered over 15k likes, which was huge for Esports social media.

<https://twitter.com/TLDoublelift/status/954848359566618624>