

Imagine you are the General Manager of an Esports team. Knowing the physical and emotional toll playing professionally can take on your players, what additional staff would you add to better support them? Think about your players needs in-season, out-of-season, and after they retire from competitive play.

I would avoid having them do boring, unnecessary and time consuming household chores for athletes like them. I would offer them home either within the main office or otherwise within the training campus. Personal chefs and nutritionists will take care of cooking for them and provide them with the best advice for a perfect diet. In addition I will offer them a personal gym and trainer to ensure not only their excellence in the gaming world but also in the real one.

Mens sana in corpore sano - "a healthy mind in a healthy body"

Mental Wellbeing is very important as well and for this reason I will assign psychologists not only on a personal but also to the team level. The focus of these activities is to be absolutely transparent with the other players and point out the problems at the time they occur. Everybody has to feel heard. There is no place for resentment, we are here to have fun playing and winning!

I will also be assigning personal and team coaches who will advise the best tactics for the team. An important role will be given by the analysts who will collect and analyze the data of the games and will give the best advice to the coach, so every team and player will always know what to improve on!

The players will also have personal rooms equipped to stretch and maintain a high media presence of our brand, there will also be technicians and coaches who will manage, improve and advise on the use of all technical equipment.

Finally, given the short career of the athletes in esports, we will help all former players to create a great personal brand to continue a career on youtube and twitch, or to enter in more managerial roles in the esports world (from coach, analyst to social media manager and event organizer).

No one will be left behind!