

Please share your experiences with Esports media. Which kind do you like best? Do you search out different types of media for different kinds of information? What do you project about the future of Esports media?

Honestly, I don't use socials like Twitter, Instagram & Facebook that much but I do often watch videos and live streams on Twitch and YouTube. Consuming this kind of content is very important if you are serious about improving!

A recent study by Microsoft concluded that the human attention span has dropped to eight seconds – shrinking nearly 25% in just a few years. Just for context, the average attention span of a goldfish is 9 seconds. Twitter, Facebook, Instagram & TikTok are leading the way with news posts and short-form video content. A perfect marketing strategy should leverage that to create short but interesting content to watch such as frag montages and interview highlights while leaving long-form videos and streams to Youtube & Twitch.

As mentioned in the course, one of the main differences we have between sports and esports are the facts that the vast majority of viewers are also gamers, so mainly the most valuable content is breakdowns of the best plays, frag montages, and advice from the pros.

In the future, I think it will be more and more true that content will be more important than who writes it, this will make things difficult for many freelance writers and amateurs who are not able to build a brand for themselves. People will listen less and less to the opinions of experts while trusting more and more pro players, franchises, and influencers.

With the recent trends of web3 and metaverse, I am very sure that there will be more and more interest in community building. Programs like discord will benefit a lot from this.

In the next few years, many games will natively move to augmented and virtual reality (AR & VR), this could lead not only to a new way of playing & experiencing games but also to a new way of creating content, and consuming content.

This is huge and could change how esports tournaments are broadcasted.
