

Esports is becoming a massive community with as high revenue as the traditional sports market. As the community rises, there is more than coaching a bunch of players and competing in tournaments. Today, we will talk about what the company needs to describe a stress-free environment as well as create better and more comfortable environments for players. As we all know, competing in a single tournament or grinding, practicing, and streaming can push the players to their limits and cause stress. This seems quite new for the people outside the community but we know what is harmful and what is not. There are several types of facilities and support that an average esports organization should have. On this topic, I'll talk about needs "inside the organization" and "out of the training grounds", as well as retirement benefits.

- Having a role assistant coach: This will improve players' perspectives and visualization of their roles about how these players will behave and sharpen their performances against their opponents. Being assisted by coaches in their roles will match the chemistry between players and coaches as well as getting to know better what they want and handling their egos.
- Players' healthcare: This becomes seconds compared to their field of work. Mostly, players always have to sit on a chair and practice all the time. As a result, they will somehow be stressed and these long period sessions will cause back pains as well as making a certain force on hands, causing them to be painful. To make a fine resolve, having certain physicians(i.e Physiatrists, Sports psychologists) and ensuring their environments will keep them comfortable and energetic.
- Team houses and foods: Last but not least, every athlete doesn't live in NA or Asia. They have to move into the clubhouses or team houses to practice with the team or even compete in tournaments with no major differences such as connectivity or reachability. We have to make sure these potato couches feel comfortable and have a nice stay. Also, making meals for them has to be precise and healthy. Some players might be choosy and some might have allergies to certain ingredients. Getting a personal chef who understands each player's favorites and a nutritionist can resolve this problem.

For the out of training grounds benefits,

- A player should get his or her holidays when it's off-season and there were no major tournaments.
- A player should have the authority to demand his or her salary bonuses, through merch, sponsors, streams, and match objectives.
- An organization should make team vacations for foreign players and staff with certain charges or maybe free of charges to motivate them.

If a player or staff retires,

- The organization should initiate a second possible career with a player or a staff to make his or her retirement truly beneficial as well as create an extra income.
- Should creating opportunities to invest in their own company to grow is somehow, a win-win situation.

These are some of the important or suggested pieces of information to make sure the players got what they surely need and also improve the company's image.
