

After completing the readings and watching the interview, elaborate further on one of five hot topics discussed this week. Remember to properly cite the resources that helped you develop this stance.

- 1) There isn't much to say about trash talk. it's a damn funny behavior if used well, plus it's fantastic to create a personal brand.
- 2) I would like to avoid talking about the topic of women in gaming because it is polarizing and often people who care about such topics are not very inclined to opinions different from their own. In any case, I think the sport should obviously be open to both sexes. I don't really have strong opinions on the creation of women-only leagues, but I find it ironic since it implies that "women are inferior to men" (which is wrong lol)
- 3) On the one hand, relegation is important because it allows nascent teams to establish themselves and win, but I also understand the need for stability on the part of sponsors. I think the right answer depends only on what your values are.

the issue that interested me most is the difference in lifestyle between streamers and pro players

If you are a pro player you are making some pretty hard life choices. Most people maybe don't know the behind-the-scenes but it's literally ten hours of screaming each day. They only get one day off a week. You have to live in a gaming house so you can't move in with a girlfriend or friends. If you slack off on that, the person who's willing to put in three more hours a day than you is going to out-compete you with that.

When I see people transition into streaming they only have to stream 6/8 hours a day, they can have their own apartment, they can have friends, and they could sort of have a life. They can take a day off as they please. totally different lifestyle. No one is going to replace them. Sometimes they do even make more money.