

Should Esports be exempt from NCAA oversight? Why is the NCAA motivated to gain control of collegiate Esports? Share your opinions about the type of relationship collegiate Esports and the NCAA should have going forward.

I don't particularly like organizational bodies, especially if all they do is create unnecessary and poorly thought out standards.

Where does the NCAA get his money? It's simply people paying to see the student athletes compete. Evidently the NCAA wants to include exports under its umbrella in order to make two more pennies. It's not surprising.

Should Esports be exempt from NCAA oversight?

There are a few things to consider:

- 1) the concept of NCAA amateurism simply will not work in the context of esports. While it would never occur to the organizer of an AAU basketball tournament to offer a cash prize because doing so would jeopardize the college eligibility of the players, such prizes are commonplace in weekend esports tournaments. Players also generate revenue from live streaming their game play on sites such as Twitch, an issue that was tackled in early August by the NCAA when it ruled that UCF football player Donald De La Haye was ineligible to continue playing because he refused to stop monetizing his athletic-related YouTube videos. This is wrong. No matter whether you're a professional or amateur, you should monetise your craft.
- 2) Collegiate esports may have good bones, but it lacks rules, regulations and enforcement mechanisms that apply to all games and all schools. These are areas in which the NCAA could add enormous value. For all that can be criticized about the NCAA, it is also the only regulatory body in a position to affect change across the entire collegiate sports landscape. Rather than simply jumping into the deep end of the pool, the NCAA recognizes that the challenges associated with collegiate esports are unique, and tackling them requires more than a cursory understanding of the ecosystem
